

Paul Accose, the Grenfell Indian, does not appear able to win a race at all these days, no matter at what distance and, though one would not like to class him among the has-beens, he is certainly not the same redskin who won many races both as an amateur and a professional. In the days when Paul first came to the front he was heralded as a world beater; he ran with life, and it was thought there were few athletes of the cinder path who could take his measure. He proved it when he won from Fred Appleby at the Arena rink last summer, but since that time he has been on the downward path. When Accose first made his appearance and won the five mile championship of Manitoba, he had a long, easy and graceful style, but he has lost it and it will need a good deal of careful handling and training, combined with a long rest, to make him the Indian of old.
